Explanation of Elements:

- Triggers are the breadth of what lights your fuse—those specific injustices that yank you out of calm and into fury. Maybe it’s a liar getting off scot-free, or someone kicking a dog—whatever it is, it’s personal. High scores mean you’ve got a hair-trigger for more types of wrongs, like unfairness or betrayal, while low scores say you’re tougher to rattle or only have a few triggers. Ott’s research shows social media floods us with these sparks daily—posts about corruption or cruelty—and some of us can’t look away. It’s less about politics and more about your moral wiring; what bugs you reveals what you value.
- Intensity is how big that fire gets once it’s lit. Do you simmer quietly or erupt like a storm? High intensity means outrage hijacks your mood—think pacing the room or ranting to a friend—while low means you shrug it off fast. Ott found online outrage often burns hotter because it’s instant and endless—you see something awful, and there’s no cooldown. It’s not just annoyance; it’s a full-body thing, like your pulse pounding over a headline. This measures how long and loud that anger echoes in you.
- Righteousness is your drive to plant a flag on the moral high ground. High scores mean you love being “right”—it’s a badge of honor, and you’ll fight to wear it. Low scores say you’d rather let it slide than flex your ethics. Ott ties this to how social media rewards virtue signaling—people post to prove they’re good, not just to vent. It’s that smug feeling when you know you’re better than the jerk who cut in line, or the thrill of schooling someone in a comment war. This is about ego as much as justice.
- Public Expression is how you let that outrage fly—do you shout it from the rooftops or bottle it up? High scores mean you’re tweeting, arguing, or telling off your uncle at dinner; low scores keep it private, maybe just a quiet grumble. Ott’s work shows digital platforms turn outrage into performance art—likes and retweets egg you on. It’s not just feeling mad; it’s showing it, whether you’re dunking on a troll or starting a petition. This tracks if you’re a megaphone or a mute button.
- Overall Outrage pulls it all together—your trigger sensitivity, anger volume, moral swagger, and loudness. Low means you’re a unicorn who stays Zen amid the chaos; high means you’re a walking flare-up, ready to clash over anything rotten. Ott’s lens paints this as a modern trap: constant exposure to wrongs, amplified by screens, makes outrage a lifestyle for some. It’s not about who’s right—it’s about how much you’re wired to care, fight, and flaunt it in a world that never shuts up.
